TEXT: [] claims he has written several letters to the late John F. Dulles, Secretary of State, in regard to similar matters under date of 15 December 1958 and 15 April 1959, but realizes that the failure to fulfill these requests was not entirely the fault of Mr. Dulles.

The debacle of the Summit Conference only confirms the view of the former Secretary of State, but there are still many naive men today who think they can negotiate with the Russians. Khrushchev created an impasse through the defunct conference in order to gain time for amassing Soviet power and to wait until America is in a weak position during the period of change between Presidents (November to January) when the Soviets would have the most favorable opportunity to start an attack.

The Free World must beat the Russian communists to the "draw," but since the USA cannot start an attack without suffering the scorn of the people in Asia, the U.S. Government should pass this role onto the Hungarians because the latter can still rally the sympathy of the world. If the U.S. would give the Hungarians substantial material support either directly or indirectly, the Hungarians would find a way to initiate this action. The writer does not believe that a world war would ensue because the Hungarians could deter the Soviets with effective propaganda, as occurred in the case of Soviet troops which defected during the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. Had the Hungarians received material support at that time, Khrushchev would not be bragging now and we would not have to be haggling about whether or not to sit down with him at a Summit meeting.
